Sources of the Law – Federal, State & Local

Bold = official source

Web sources listed are usually the official government web site but not always

Important concepts:

PRIMARY / SECONDARY

- Primary sources publish the law itself, i.e., the rules that local, state, and federal governments will enforce. Sources of primary law include ordinances, statutes, treaties, court decisions, court rules, administrative rules and regulations, administrative agency decisions, and executive orders and decrees. Example: U.S. Statutes at Large.
- Secondary sources of law are materials that help find the law, or explain or comment on it, but are not "the law itself." Law review articles, treatises, legal encyclopedias, digests, and loose-leaf reporters are secondary sources. Example: Corpus Juris Secundum (CJS).

OFFICIAL / UNOFFICIAL

- Official sources are those publications sanctioned by a government or court as the authoritative text of the law. Courts generally require citation to "official" sources of law. Example: United States Reports.
- Unofficial sources are commercially published and usually more timely. They are editorially enhanced to improve usefulness as a research tool. Example: Supreme Court Reporter (West publication, unofficial). Commercially published sources are sometimes designated as the "official" texts to be cited to courts. Example: Washington Reports (LexisNexis publication designated as official).

ANNOTATED / UNANNOTATED

- Annotated sources publish the text of the law with additional information. The text of the law is primary material; the annotations are secondary material. Annotations can include case summaries, citations to cases interpreting the law, referrals to relevant periodical articles, legislative history, editorial notes, and analysis. Example: West's revised code of Washington annotated.
- Unannotated sources publish the bare text of the law. Example: Revised Code of Washington.

CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD / CODE: Codes extract the laws and regulations in force from the chronological record and bring them together in broad subject areas (e.g., civil code, criminal code, labor code, probate code). Chronological Record Example: Session laws of the State of Washington. Code Example: Revised code of Washington.
